Take the example of going on a vacation - you can go on-line and watch photos from all over the world, get in touch with your friends to give their impressions about various places, buy things and even book hotels and trains. When traveling on the web, however, there is always a risk that your data is lost in case of a power failure, system crash or even if some malicious intruder/hacker has the opportunity to hack your device. And that's where Unigos comes into play, allowing you to transfer information between your handheld and a PC safely, securely and efficiently. Developed by a team of IT and Networking experts, Unigos is a program with a unique approach for data transfer between your Palm OS® handheld and a PC. The program is based on the protocol known as OData that enables you to download data from a PC and sync your handheld with a database (MS SQL Server is supported) by creating a remote desktop to the PC. The remote desktop's monitor displays your handheld as you would see it on your PC, including all the menus and screen components. How does it work? After connecting to the Unigos server, you can list all the folders and files on the PC, and then select the ones you want to transfer to the handheld. The program will store the data in different file formats, like EDB, TNS and NSF. User Guide (BEGIN) - Enter the data you want to transfer and click next. - Choose the options to save the application on a specific folder on the computer or to get a kind of link that you can use to get to the application later. - Under
