With respect to pneumatic tires generally, it has been strongly demanded that the treads exhibit a high degree of design freedom. In pneumatic tires, the lateral wall portions of treads are worn substantially at an equal rate with respect to the equatorial plane and shoulder portions thereof. This state is liable to produce a so-called burnishing in the shoulder portions of the tire, with the result that the tread edges are so deformed as to have pointed ends. It is common practice to arrange the tire of this type in such a manner as to suppress the burnishing of the tire treads, for example, by inclining the tread edges in the lateral direction of the tire. In tires of the type described, however, if the tread edges are inclined outwardly in the lateral direction of the tire, the distance between the tread edges and the ground traveling therepast on the shoulder portions of the tire is so short that such tread edges are liable to be broken. This is because the tread edges are contacted with the ground in inclined relation thereto. In the worst case, the tread edges cannot contact the ground at all, and it is not possible to apply the load to the ground. Also, the lateral walls are inclined outwardly, the possibility of the entire tire being unseated from the rim flange
