The purpose of the proposed research is to investigate the role of hormones and growth factors in regulating reproductive maturation and development. The focus of the current year's research is to elucidate the mechanisms underlying the emergence of ovarian follicles in pre-pubertal sheep. Emphasis will be placed on the roles of hormones and growth factors in regulation of the follicular growth and selection process. Immature follicles will be classified into cohorts according to the degree of O-glycosylation of mucin. Morphological, biochemical, and molecular studies will be carried out to characterize the growth and selection of follicles in vivo. In addition, follicular growth and selection will be characterized in vitro by culturing follicles in short-term organ culture. Follicles selected in vivo and in vitro will be characterized by electron microscopy, immunohistochemistry, and enzyme activity assays. The goal is to compare selected and unselected follicles for differences in the degree of O-glycosylation, protein composition, and enzyme activity, as well as in the hormone and growth factor receptors. In addition, the changes in adenylate cyclase activity, protein kinase activity, and guanine nucleotide binding proteins (G-proteins) in estrogen and FSH regulated follicles will be determined, as will the regulation of G-proteins by hormones and growth factors. In addition, preliminary experiments have suggested the presence of a FSH-like molecule in serum of pre-pubertal 3e33713323
