In this work, we reported the resonator mediated microwave-to-thermomechanical sensing response of MoS₂ based thin film for the first time. We fabricated a flexible microbridge resonator (MMR) which consists of a thin metallic film above the thin film thermomechanical material on the flexible polymeric substrate. A square-shaped MMR with an optimum geometry was used to estimate the real part of the dynamic modulus. From the thermomechanical behavior of MoS₂ based thin film, the resonance frequency and the quality factor (Q) were examined at the range of different temperatures. The Q factor of the fabricated MMR thin film structure was found to be approximately 1.6×10^3 at room temperature. The resonance frequency of the MMR was examined through the temperature control, and it was found to decrease until approximately 29 °C, which was further increased to approximately 30 °C. A response of 1.75 MHz/°C was obtained at room temperature, where the value was increased by two-fold when increased by -2 °C. In conclusion, the device response was expected to decrease with the increase in temperature, which may be a potential tool for sensing temperature.
