Now i want to send the canvas to a server for further processing. I do this by using drawImage method. I need to set the height and width of canvas when I do this, but since the drawimage resizes the canvas before sending it to the server, the canvas becomes different on the server. To solve this problem I thought that can I set the width and height of the canvas when I receive the first data from it (let it know that it is the first load). For Desktop I solved this by looking into the timeStamp attribute of the HTMLCanvasElement. In mobile what is the best way to solve this? A: I think you could store the saved contents of the canvas when you get them back from the server and then restore the contents when you initialise the canvas. However, the contents may change while your app is running. For example, if you do a whole bunch of drawing on the canvas. So when you initially load the canvas, you'll want to save the contents of it. When the canvas is updated, you'd want to replace the contents of it with the updated contents (cancel the initial save). 0.7553 TimeMean 0.7558 0 3e33713323
