Receive an online value estimate or contact us to find out more."We're here today because we believe this is a matter of life and death," Oxfam said in a statement. The British charity had petitioned the European Parliament since January, claiming that an EU-wide ban on fox hunting would "save the lives of at least 11,000 foxes a year". About 600 animal rights groups backed Oxfam's call for a European ban on the sport. The UK already outlaws fox hunting, and the charity is calling for a similar nationwide ban on "canned hunting", as the hunts call it. In the UK, the Hunting Act 2004 bans the hunting of wild mammals with the exception of members of the hunt and their dogs - with exceptions for some domestic animals. But the charity said there were significant loopholes in the law. "The Hunting Act doesn't apply in as many places as it should. In fact, two thirds of people who have contacted us have told us that fox hunting is still legal in their area," Oxfam said. While individual hunts ban their members from having dogs chase foxes, "canned hunting" by packs of dogs is legal in Wales, England, Northern Ireland, and Scotland. Oxfam also said that hunting can "harm and even kill" foxes, and that it was a "woefully inadequate law". "Oxfam is incredibly heartened that a total ban on commercial hunting in England has finally been recommended by a committee of MPs," it added. In February, the government rejected the recommendation of a committee that called for the ban to be extended to Northern Ireland, where hunts are not
