Ischaemic stroke in a young patient with absent right-to-left shunt on Valsalva testing: the role of hypopituitarism. A 28-year-old man presented with symptoms of an ischaemic stroke. Transesophageal echocardiography (TEE) did not reveal any sinus of Valsalva defect, but the patient had profound primary hypopituitarism associated with panhypopituitarism. He had been known for non-specific neuropsychiatric complaints for many years. Hypopituitarism is a rare cause of non-cerebral thromboembolism. The pathophysiologic mechanisms leading to cerebral thrombosis are poorly understood and there are only few case reports of cerebrovascular thromboembolism in hypopituitarism. We report this unusual presentation and discuss possible mechanisms for the development of ischaemic stroke in this patient. Lambda EXCL — a solution for Dual Cluster Kubernetes setup In my previous posts I have been describing how to build Kubernetes clusters, and how to install Kubernetes cluster on top of the Redhat Openshift platform. If you remember, it was an old issue: kube-system pods could not be deleted. It's a problem to create and delete nodes in a separate cluster (which is then used for bare-metal pods on machines), because of the lack of permissions. As I was solving this issue, I came up with the solution which I am going to describe in this post. It's called Lambda EXCL, or Lambda Exception Container for Kubernetes cluster. Here's a little bit about why you might need this. You've installed Kubernetes on a machine, and there are pods on some nodes of your cluster. You need to update pods, so you need to create a Kubernetes cluster within another Kubernetes cluster, which is used for bare-metal pods. You need to create a separate cluster, because you don't have permissions to delete or create nodes within a shared Kubernetes

; Ejiao and Nanjieba in the Netherlands Vernon's Legacy; Ejiao and Nanjieba in the Netherlands An interview with Nanjieba Wu. The following article is based on an interview, by A.C. Zhang, with Nanjieba Wu, a master of ejiao, in Bodhgaya, India, October 2009. His teacher had died a few days previously. He also has studied tea in China. He uses the nanjieba pebble tea method and he won awards from China and the Netherlands for it. From A.C. Zhang When I researched Buddhism as part of a monastic-study project, I was surprised to find so many outstanding Master-Suzuko-like characters of Buddhist history. They are revered by all Theravadan traditions and many Tibetan; but their origins are obscure. Who were these people? Were they lowly? Or were they reputedly scholars? Many of them are famous for perpetrating religious fraud and other evil deeds, and yet they seem to be revered by millions of people. Were these really creative and pious monks? (Or was it their destiny to be so?) I heard about ejiao before I met Master Nanjieba. It was in Shaolin Temple, Beijing, that I first heard of it. People spoke highly about ejiao- as if it was the highest-grade tea. I was surprised, so I asked Master Zhiyi, who is an authority on Chinese tea, where it came from. He described it as a tea that has a high concentration of active ingredients, and is created solely from pure and fragrant buds of tea (茶芽), but as it was so cheap, even in the ancient times, it was not popular among ordinary people. Much later, Nanjieba Wu visited Beijing from China, and he happened to learn the pebble-tea method. In Taiwan, where there are many wonderful pebble-tea plantations, Nanjieba is acknowledged as the best. Thousands of types of ejiao are made in China by anyone who wants to make it. The Chinese government banned it as a valueless "chaotic product". It is illegal to advertise its quality, so it is virtually unknown outside of China. Yet, millions of ordinary people are fanatical about it! In fact, it is often adulterated by careless
