The simulation covers the Union Pacific FEF-3 freighthauling and moderate speed train transport in the 1980's. The locomotive has been diligently rebuilt to model the AU8540A, or "Matiuk". The on-screen picture is as accurate as possible. All graphics are of the real USRP 1985. *Callsign changes of U.P. units, -MU for Milwaukee units, -LNE, LN for Leads, -AC, A for Altoona, and -NAT for Natchez switching and yards. On sites in the U.S. Union Pacific is the main player in the North American rail system. They provide freight rail service for heavy commodities (mostly coal to/from Wyoming to Mexico). They also operate a regional passenger service called, the Amtrak California Zephyr (known to UP as "PCCW"). Sometimes they also operate the Gateway Pacific Express trains to California via San Diego. The California Zephyr passes as a national passenger train along the west coast, in addition it has an eastern rail which crosses the mid-Atlantic. In 1970, UP acquired the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy railroad to form the Union Pacific. It didn't take long for the UP to start upgrading CB&Q industrial trackage and switching (especially those that CB&Q brought from Wisconsin), and in the process acquired ALL of the Burlington Northern Railroad's switching properties. UP continued to improve the Southern Pacific "Superliners", which were improved from the "Super-K-Line". UP once had a line along the San Joaquin Valley of California and New Mexico (known as the Central Pacific railway), which was initially merged with the Union Pacific, but was later sold off. Union Pacific is rumored to be building their own high-speed rail lines through the Gulf Coast states of Texas. ---Handbrakes---In both A-GL and any other model. ---Tracks--- UP uses two different strip systems. One is Peco, which is much like 0:1 scale strip, it is very accurate. As of now, I use Peco, and it is the best in my opinion. The other Peco type is the cheap and low-contrast plastic strip. This is not as accurate, and for the price, it is not worth using, especially if you are using a 1:128 Atlas, since it will just not look right. (same for 1:5 Atlas) ---Lamps and signals
