Tunable all-dye-mediated polymerization of methyl methacrylate in supercritical CO<sub>2</sub>. We report a new method for the polymerization of methyl methacrylate in supercritical CO<sub>2</sub> with good reproducibility, high conversions, and a tunable degree of polymerization. The free-radical initiator is an azo dye, named D153, that is active in a supercritical CO<sub>2</sub> matrix, where it can be efficiently solubilized, and soluble in the organic phase of a biphasic reaction medium, composed of supercritical CO<sub>2</sub> and methyl methacrylate. An optimization study of the experimental conditions showed that an initial reaction temperature at 80 degrees C is essential to ensure the formation of small polymers with controlled molecular weights. The polymerization rate is also maximum at 80 degrees C. The high reactivity of the initiator in supercritical CO<sub>2</sub> matrix allows the polymerization to be run under relatively mild conditions, such as shorter times and lower temperatures. The evolution of the reactions under the different reaction conditions is monitored by time-resolved UV spectroscopy and the polymerization degree is determined by analysis of the time-dependent data. The results show a linear increase of the molecular weight with the reaction time, with a high homogeneity of the reaction (same reaction and conversion for all the reactions). The control over the reaction degree by mixing the monomer and the initiator is illustrated by the formation of monomer grafts on polymer beads. The utilization of an initiator whose function in the supercritical matrix can be switched by the temperature allows the tuning of the polymerization degree. The polymerization of methyl methacrylate in supercritical CO<sub>2</sub> can thus be performed with high reproducibility, providing large quantities of polymers of controlled molecular weights, with the possibility of adjusting the degree of polymerization by combining the initiator with monomer. The current state of single nucleotide polymorphisms (SNPs) in three common species, bullfrog (Rana catesbeiana), medaka (Oryzias latipes), and tilapia (Oreochromis niloticus) will be used to develop a novel approach to identify causal genes and pathways that control key processes such as growth, reproduction, development, and their interconnections in vertebrate animals. The proposed SNP maps will be an important tool for this approach, providing researchers with a comprehensive list of potentially functional SNPs throughout the genome, and affording new opportunities for examining causal relationships between

Between January 1985 and July 1987, 26 children with newly diagnosed acute myeloid leukemia in first remission were entered into a prospective Phase II study designed to determine the effect of reducing the dose of melphalan administered to children undergoing a conditioning regimen with melphalan plus an arabinoside (ara-C) for bone marrow transplantation. The children were randomized to receive high-dose melphalan (180 mg/m<sup>2</sup>) versus standard-dose melphalan (60 mg/m<sup>2</sup>) as the preparative regimen. Both groups were matched for blast cell count at diagnosis, age, sex, performance status, and the status of the marrow donors. The patients treated with melphalan 80 mg/m<sup>2</sup> had a 2-year event-free survival rate of 59% (95% confidence interval, 30-85%) as compared with a 2-year event-free survival rate of 60% (95% confidence interval, 39-81%) in those treated with melphalan 60 mg/m<sup>2</sup>. The 2-year overall survival rates were 90% (95% confidence interval, 69-97%) and 89% (95% confidence interval, 74-96%) in the two treatment arms, respectively. The following end points were evaluated: (1) complete remission; (2) 2-year survival; and (3) incidence of graft-versus-host disease and graft failure. These
