It's not really an animation or animation tool. Those tools are usually in the'more specialized' category. I don't mean to advertise or anything, but for a software engineer who wants to start building software, it's very very useful, and it offers the advantage of having a very crisp idea of what your program does. It's a huge learning tool as well, and it has a huge userbase. Lamp, you can also find the 'lesson/tutorial' videos on YouTube (there's plenty of them) as well as the various forums, where the user base is much larger. If you want to use it on Windows (what it seems you are doing), you can find crackl software that can crack a serial key and give you an activation code. That's the easiest thing to do if you want to go this route. You can learn the basics and the many, many utilities that are available and just explore the manual. If you want to start working on some animation software, this is what I'd recommend. It's very easy, free, and has a huge user base. You can find plenty of video tutorials. The V-Ray Pro has a few things that are great for 3d artists. The main one is that it has a'materials' book, where you can get a solid understanding of what each material does, how to use it (in most cases), etc. What you can do with it also to help you a lot. You can generate a series of material setup (based on the colors used, such as fire, grass, stone, etc.) and the settings for each. After you generate the setup, you can then use the stock settings and then edit the setup to customize them. You can also save your setups (I believe you can only save them as part of a.obj file - no.blend or any other file, just one with the same name and extension), and you can share them with your friends. You can also check out the material generation options, such as bump, ambient occlusion, etc. The final two that are great are the tone mapping and HDR options. HDR just makes the world brighter and more colorful (you have to have a high quality monitor to see the difference, but you can save the settings for all projects and use them across the board). Tone mapping enables you to generate a tonal map for any scene, so even if it's a plain-
