Understanding Educational Needs of Adolescents and Young Adults With Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities in Germany: A Qualitative Study. As new forms of information and communication technology penetrate social contexts, adolescents and young adults (AYAs) are now increasingly involved in social, educational, and professional contexts as active agents and as recipients of various educational services. Their understanding of how to access educational services is likely to depend on their perceptions of their needs for such services. The current study is the first to examine young adults with intellectual and developmental disabilities (IDD) in Germany about their needs for educational services. It examined the perceptions of 22 IDD AYAs with regard to their educational needs. The data were collected via individual in-depth interviews. Content analysis was used to identify categories that best described the perceived needs of AYAs with IDD. The results show that IDD AYAs perceive that their educational needs relate to the development of coping and problem-solving skills, as well as learning and knowledge acquisition. Perceived needs regarding the classroom, teacher, and learning environment differ according to the level of impairment and age. These results help to better understand the needs of AYAs with IDD. Specifically, they may help educators and policy makers to design targeted education programs that can best support the needs of AYAs with IDD.
