The work-related ability of predation pressure and success of the productivity rate were both positively associated with the fieldwork productivity. The estimates of the odds of excess fieldwork productivity were found to be 13.6 times higher for the aged than for the younger work age group. The relatively low number of older workers in the sample was the only possible explanation for the discrepancy between our results and those of the previous studies. Recent research investigating the association between gender and age with fieldwork outcomes provided mixed conclusions on the occupational health implications of aging. Some studies have shown that aging may negatively affect the fieldwork results [39,40]. However, in contrast, the findings of the study by Park et al. (2011) suggested that aging was positively associated with the fieldwork productivity [41]. In this study, older age was positively related to the fieldwork productivity in males but not in females. The higher number of older workers in our sample may explain this phenomenon. A main finding of the present study was that work age was negatively related to the outcome of the productivity rate. In addition, our study found a significantly positive relationship between work age and self-reported effort. We suggest that the negative relationship between work age and the productivity rate is a result of the higher self-reported effort and lower probability of getting the maximal fieldwork output among older workers. This finding may suggest that the real difference in productivity between older and younger work age workers is not as great as that found in this study. In a sense, the lower productivity level for older workers can be explained by the normative declines in physical function, cognitive abilities, and skills among older adults [42].
