?The attack, while significant, is not necessarily the sea-change moment Trump's base might have envisioned. With Trump failing to sell a policy and a message, can his base support him with what he has so far offered? While the president's allies had begun to advance this line, it fell apart even more recently when experts refuted it. And the stronger case for Trump's priorities falls inside the Republican coalition. Trump's policies are consistent with traditional GOP priorities. The jobs for Americans policies that the president has advanced, in fact, are more consistent with the very Republicans who have enjoyed the benefits of his presidency. AD AD Trump's base believes that his policies promise to increase the proportion of Americans who are employed and increase the number of jobs. His policies aimed at job creation, in fact, include policies focused on domestic energy — not overseas energy — directed at driving down the price of gas. As data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Federal Reserve Board show, the number of Americans in the labor force has been trending down, not up. It would appear, in fact, that the smaller labor force is due to people retiring or dropping out, rather than new workers entering the workforce. Even when the number of employed Americans is rising, as it is now, it is not a positive development. Over the past several years, it has been unclear whether this upward trend is due to better demand for labor from employers or increasing unemployment among the jobless. By and large, though, the former is the more important factor. AD AD While one might think that the economy would suffer if it were to go into a recession, the evidence suggests that it would be just as healthy if it instead maintained full employment. In other words, employment growth may be better for the economy than unemployment reduction. There is also a wealth of evidence showing that market labor conditions dictate supply, not demand, in the business cycle. The more promising measure of job creation is the ratio of employment to job seekers. As of May 2015, the BLS data reveal that there were some 87 unemployed Americans for every 100 job seekers. This ratio has, over the past year, moved into the 80s. This better measure of job creation suggests that Trump's efforts are bearing fruit. Trump has introduced a variety of policies to help reenergize the economy. The Trump administration has also been effective in terms of getting unemployment 6d1f23a050
