later published:15 Mar 2010 views:15388 As of 2010s, still ongoing health problems caused by the nuclear disaster in Chernobyl, Ukraine have developed a whole new generation. 10 years later, many of these children are now at least 10 years old. Some of them spent a lot of time in state care during the first 10 years of their lives and have spent a good part of their childhood missing school - and leaving their peers behind. They were never too bright in the first place, but the disaster has made their long-term future extremely uncertain.
Traces of radiation linger in some of their organs even today. So how are these kids doing now, 10 years on?
Do they think their lives will improve now, or will they find themselves still so far behind their peers that they have little chance of fitting in? This is the story of 10 of them, as told by the BBC to document their experiences in the last 10 years. Editor's note: The World Health Organization does not require any exposure to exceed 3 mSv for an entire lifetime. While the annual dose of 0.2-0.5 mSv is an amount that is considered safe and natural for most people, other organisations have recommended more stringent limits to the number of mSv of exposure to people. 10 year after Chernobyl - 10
